Turning to India, it must be acknowledged first that the frequency of assault on women is high in the country. To that terrible general recognition has to be added the special role of violence connected with particular social features, such as dowry and economic settlements. Even though the number involved in violent deaths are dwarfed by the large numbers that perish from neglect of health care and social attention, the crude, brutal nature of this form of gender inequality makes it a particular severe manifestation of the deprivation of women.

This inequality has been traced by some commentators to the physical asymmetry of men and women, with men having greater immediate power in the gross bodily sense. Undoubtedly, this asymmetry does have a substantial role in the prevalence and survival of affairs, made worse by periods of particular vulnerability for women, such as gestation and post-natal phases.
